Photo: Courtesy of Taschen There was a time when the world seemed big and glamorous, and the transcontinental journey promised excitement and adventure, not annoyed waiting hours on the runway. 20th Century Travel, a compendium of more than 400 warehouse adverts for luxury liners, tall hotels and passenger planes with impossibly spacious seats (not to mention a locomotive equipped with cinema), follows our sunny obsession with escaping from it all. These brilliantly colored pages date back to a time when the sky was always blue, travelers dressed in the latest fashions, and for a while the seats on the aisle at PSA airlines were $13.50. 20th Century Travel: 100 Years of Globe-Trotting Ads. Photo Ed Reeve's trip to Radhanagar Beach in the Andaman Islands, off the coast of Myanmar (though technically part of India), is not for tired: You fly to Kolkata, connect two and a half hours to Port Blair, take a 90-minute ferry to Havelock Island, and then drive another 30 minutes on the road rattling the bones. The payday, though, is the huge, one-and-a-quarter mile strip of dazzling white sand wedged between the electrically green trees and the bluest water you've ever seen. You can immediately announce that this is one of the most beautiful beaches in the world (if 3G signals do not exist, you can summon rankings to support you). But Gautam, a canoe guide driving me through the mangrove forest on the island, is harder to impress. Think Radhanagar is beautiful? he asks in Hindi. The island of South Cinque has a beach so beautiful, so beautiful that if you set it next to each other, no one will even look at Radhanagar. From geography, the Andamans make more sense as part of Myanmar or Thailand than India, to which they actually belong. Of the 572 islands, only 38 are inhabited and 26 are open to the public, and for decades, the remoteness of the atoll and lack of infrastructure, but the abundance of coral reefs, have attracted serious divers, adventurous backpackers and fearless A-listers like Johnny Depp and Kate Winslet. Havelock also had a ferry-packed Indian newlyweds getting off, brides easily distinguished by their wrists covered in red bracelets. More than 100 resorts cater to them, but options ranged from budget to basic until now. Andamans' first luxury retreat, the newly opened Taj Exotica Resort & Spa, a 46-acre location along Radhanagar Beach, has been around for nearly a decade. The heritage of the islands is visible throughout, from nicobari welcome song to 72 villas on stilts with dome roofs modeled on the huts of the Jarawa tribe of the region. For settlers, chef Kaushik Misra traveled all over the archipelago to stock up on the recipes of the Indian communities that migrated to the islands: a grouper steamed fillet in banana leaf from Keralites in Diglipur, fry lobster pepper from tamil communities on Mayabunder, And while Taj's almost deserted beachfront perfectly favors five days of hardcore relaxation, it does kind of miss the point of visiting the Andamans. Take a fishing trip to John Lawrence Island, snorkel near Neill Island or go on a trip to the beach Beach. You can (and should) kayak in mangrove forests day, and again at night to see bioluminescence sparking like fireworks around the paddle. Paddle.
